GERVAY HOMESTEAD NO. 2, BARN

HABS No. WY-162-B

Location: The site is located on both sides of Cow Creek along an unnamed access road, approximately one mile northwest of Mexican Hill, two miles southwest of Devil Canyon, and .75 mile west of the Bighorn National Forest boundary. The closest populated town is Lovell, Wyoming, approximately 21 miles west. USGS Mexican Hill Quadrangle, UTM coordinates 12. 736866.4975145.

Significance: This site is associated with the early twentieth-century livestock industry in Big Horn County (Criterion A). During this time period, the Little Mountain region was used for summer pasture for grazing livestock. The site, part of a 320-acre homestead parcel, is a component of a network of small buildings utilized for shelter by herders while managing livestock in this rugged and remote area. This site was the original location of the homestead improvements made to obtain a patent in 1925, but the land parcel was subsequently sold and absorbed into larger ranching operations on Little Mountain.

Description: Building B is a log barn (20' E-W x 20'6" N-S) with a collapsed roof, located on the opposite or north side of Cow Creek from Building A. It appears that it was a gable-roofed building, and there are the remnants of a loft consisting of nine logs with ends notched into the north and south walls. The principal walls are constructed of ten-to-twelve courses of full round peeled logs sawn at the ends and joined at the corners with saddle notching. The notches are partially sawn and the wood removed, creating rather flat notches. Most of the mud chinking has eroded out of the cracks between the logs. Some of the logs retain wood strips that once held the chinking in place. Some of the logs are anchored at the corners with large round spikes. The remaining walls slant downslope to the south. No window or door bays are located in any of the remaining log walls.

History: Building B, the collapsed log barn, was probably constructed by Stephen Gervay for his homestead in about 1913. The site is located on a 316.18-acre parcel of land patented by Elizabeth Gervay, widow of Stephen Gervay (HE Patent No. 0954395) on February 27, 1925. Stephen Gervay resided on the homestead and grazed sheep. According to homestead records, he also cleared about 30 acres of land on which he raised oats and hay and some potatoes. Gervay was a Hungarian emigrant and married Elizabeth Thoman on December 4, 1923. She resided with him on the homestead until March 1924, when he died from exposure or a heart attack while hunting. Left alone on the homestead without knowing the fate of her husband, the pregnant Elizabeth sought help after her supplies ran out. She walked off Little Mountain through deep snow and managed to reach a ranch near Lovell three days later. She suffered from frostbite and exposure and lost her unborn baby. A search party subsequently found Stephen Gervay's body, and Elizabeth returned to her home in East St. Louis, Illinois. She subsequently patented the homestead and sold it in 1927.

The parcel was purchased by the Big Horn Livestock Company, which was formed on May 25, 1936. C.A. Lewis, Leo Hopkins, and C. Golden Welch were the principal officers. The place of business was the Town of Cowley, Big Horn County, Wyoming, and the corporation was capitalized at $50,000. The Big Horn Livestock Company grazed 12,000 to 14,000 sheep on Little Mountain starting around the first of June each year. The sheep were driven part way up Little Mountain via a road built in the 1930s by the Civilian Conservation Corps, then up

Pete's Canyon to the top. By mid-summer, the sheep were moved up into the Bighorn National Forest, then back down in October. C.A. Lewis died in 1964, and his son Rodney continued the operation. At that time, the outfit consisted of eighteen herders and two camp tenders. The sheep operation continued on Little Mountain until the 1980s, when the Bischoff family acquired most of the property and leases and grazed cattle.
